

Contents

Preface: International management in the light of the European Union . . . . .	1
1 Regarding the research and conception of the examination . . . . .	3
1.1 The sociology of management in Great Britain and Germany – with reference to research and the social discussion . . . . .	3
1.2 Cross-national management research – Regarding the arrangement, carrying out and objective of the Anglo-German comparison . . . . .	18
2 The work and professional capacity of German and English managers . . . . .	33
2.1 The empirical fields in Germany and England . . . . .	33
2.1.1 Characteristics of the selected enterprises . . . . .	35
2.1.2 Characteristics of the examined management group . . . . .	38
2.2 Training, recruitment and careers of managers in Germany and England. . . . .	41
2.2.1 The ambivalent development of the management situation . . . . .	41
2.2.2 Is company management lacking good trainees? . . . . .	45
2.2.3 Advice from top managers to young people . . . . .	50
2.2.4 Practicians in England and academics in Germany? Regarding the professional training of managers. . . . .	54
2.2.5 The academicisation of management – A necessary, but not sufficient requirement . . . . .	65
2.2.6 The recruitment of top managers: Internally or externally? . . . . .	69
2.2.7 The professional and career paths of industrial company managers . . . . .	74
2.3 Have German managers got a “Beruf” and their English colleagues only a “job”? Regarding the managerial understanding and qualifications of top managers. . . . .	92
2.3.1 The managerial understanding of company managers . . . . .	92
2.3.2 Professional qualifications or personality-related qualities? Specialist or generalist? . . . . .	100
2.3.3 Management as a “Beruf”? . . . . .	106
2.4 The daily run of work, job satisfaction and the private sphere of the top managers . . . . .	114

2.4.1	Job satisfaction . . . . .	115
2.4.2	The top manager and his family . . . . .	127
2.4.3	Working hard – less celebrating: working time and weekend . . . . .	139
2.5	What do managers really do? – Regarding the understanding of the role of top executives. . . . .	142
3	Different aspects of the relations of English and German managers to the company, technology and the market . . . . .	155
3.1	Human resource management in England and corporate culture in Germany – Themes of fashion or new concepts of management? . . . . .	156
3.1.1	The origin of the new management thinkers and the aims of the discussion about corporate culture and human resource management . . . . .	156
3.1.2	Corporate culture and human resource management as management ideology and as an instrument of authority or as part of a co-determined company working policy? – Experiences and views of the managers . . . . .	164
3.2	Technology versus finance – The “technology obsession” of the German managers and the “shopkeeper mentality” of the English managers? . . . . .	169
3.3	The British society holds little account of its own industry . . . . .	180
3.4	Foresighted industrial policy or short term maximization of profits – With regard to the role played by the banks in Great Britain . . . . .	186
3.5	Fear of Europe? The expectations of English and German managers of the united market in Europe . . . . .	189
3.6	Interim result regarding the English system of industry: The English industrial manager – Does he really prefer to be a gentleman rather than a professional company manager? . . . . .	195
4	The relationship of English and German managers towards politics and the society. . . . .	201
4.1	Owner-managers or employed managers – Who can manage a company better? . . . . .	202
4.2	“Industrial relations” – Victorian class barriers in England and open social structures in Germany? . . . . .	210
4.2.1	The different systems of industrial relations in England and Germany . . . . .	211
4.2.2	Trade unions – A stabilizing factor or opposing power? . . . . .	214
4.2.3	The cooperative model in Germany and conflict model in England – The views of the managers regarding the works constitution . . . . .	219

Contents	IX
4.2.4 Industrial managers and industrial relations – A conclusion . . .	226
4.3 Regarding the tense relationship between the company good and the common good as seen from the managers' point of view . . .	231
4.4 The view of the managers regarding State-political action . . .	235
4.5 Top managers and the democratic process . . . . .	244
5 Conclusion: Regarding the transferability of national models – What can German and English managers learn from each other? . . . . .	249
References . . . . .	255