Tables

4.1 Selected established companies’ alliance shares in the semiconductor industry (in percentages)
4.2 Variations in country networks
4.3 Sources of flexibility
4.4 Alliance type by semiconductor start-ups
4.5 Alliance type by biotechnology start-ups
5.1 Case studies
6.1 The companies with the largest number of strategic technology alliances, 1980–4 and 1985–9
6.2 The leading companies according to strategic technology alliances in information technologies, biotechnology, and new materials
6.3 A comparison of network density in core technologies (for the 45 firms with the most strategic technology relations)
6.4 The assumed relation between modes of strategic technology alliances and their strategic content
6.5 A classification of modes of strategic technology alliances and their organizational interdependence
6.6 The growth of different modes of strategic technology alliances, 1985–9 (1980–4 = 1.00)
10.1 Number of knitwear firms in the province of Modena by number of employees and principal phases of production
10.2 Twenty-year change in distribution of Modena firms by workforce size
10.3 Typical sequence in knitwear production
12.1 Shares of central divisions in total sales of the five most important steel enterprises in western Germany (in percentages)
12.2 Structure of orders in plant engineering (shares in total volume of orders)
13.1 National, community, and international mergers (including acquisition of majority holdings) in the European Community 286
13.2 EC mergers by size (combined sales) of firms involved 287
13.3 Evolution of concentration in EC industry: shares of largest firms in total turnover and employment (in percentages) 287
13.4 Foreign involvement in manufacturing in selected European countries (in percentages) 288
