

CONTENTS

Acknowledgements	vii
Introduction	1
Introduces the debate surrounding the editions of Yeats' collected poems, including the placement of the narrative and dramatic poems and which poem Yeats wanted to be his last, and explains why this Readers' Guide takes the form that it does.
CHAPTER ONE	8
Lives of the Poet
Surveys the numerous stories of Yeats' life, beginning with his own somewhat mythical autobiographies. Looks at early biographies by Joseph Hone, Richard Ellmann and A. Norman Jeffares, as well as recent publications by Terence Brown, Brenda Maddox, Ann Saddlemyer and R.F. Foster.
CHAPTER TWO	18
Yeats and Revivalism
Examines the part Yeats played in the Irish literary revival, as well as the consequences of that revival for the culture, for other Irish writers and for Yeats himself. Includes extracts from early histories of the movement by W.P. Ryan and Ernest A. Boyd; from essays by the poets Patrick Kavanagh and Thomas Kinsella rejecting both Yeats and revivalism; from Mary Helen Thuente's book on his radical use of Irish folklore; from studies by T.R. Henn, Donald T. Torchiana, W.J. McCormack and Seamus Deane on Yeats' later identification with the Anglo-Irish tradition; and from Declan Kiberd's recent survey of Irish literature that sees Yeats as a modern version of the Gaelic poet Aogán Ó Rathaille.

CHAPTER THREE	64
Yeats and Modernism
Explores Yeats' relationship to modernism, particularly his close personal relationship with the young American poet Ezra Pound. Extracts from Pound's early essay calling Yeats a symbolist, not a modernist, and Edmund Wilson's longer study of that debt to symbolism; from Frank Kermode and Harold Bloom's arguments that Yeats is best read as a romantic poet; from studies by F.R. Leavis and C.K. Stead that see Yeats as a modern but not a modernist poet; and from discussions by Richard Ellmann, Thomas Parkinson and James Longenbach as to whether Pound modernised Yeats or Yeats helped Pound to refine his thinking about modernism.
CHAPTER FOUR	108
Yeats and Nationalism
Looks at those crucial moments in Yeats' life when he became involved in politics, especially his involvement with Ireland's Blueshirts in the 1930s. Includes extracts from J.M. Hone's early attempt to portray Yeats as a nationalist; from essays by W.H. Auden, Louis MacNeice and George Orwell in which each writer examines the relationship between Yeats' poetry and his right-wing politics; from Conor Cruise O'Brien's outspoken attack on Yeats' fascism in 1965 and subsequent responses to that attack by Patrick Cosgrave, Grattan Freyer, Elizabeth Cullingford and Paul Scott Stanfield; and from Edward W. Said's essay in which he argues that Yeats is not only a nationalist but also a postnationalist poet.
Conclusion	153
Notes	157
Selected Bibliography	167
Index	171