I The Language and Rhetoric of Comedy 9

Irony lies at the heart of comic technique. All comedy is a manipulation of deceptive appearances. 10

Language is a vast sea of comic possibilities swirling beneath rational discourse. 19

Nonsense, both calculated and spontaneous, is one of the chief by-products of language. 25

Comic aimlessness and stupidity create the illusion of naive, unconscious humor. 32

Popular humor is topical and satirical. 37

Condensation and an epigrammatic style are essential aspects of comic creativity. 40

Perfect timing is the ideal all actors and joke-tellers are striving to achieve. 45

II Comic Characters: Conventions and Types 49

Conventions are a tacit agreement between playwright and audience about social stereotypes and the ways of representing them. 50

Identity is conventionally defined by external signs, and costume is a significant expression of personality. 53

Comic characters begin with fixed and sometimes arbitrary values and connotations. 56

In most comedies, wit replaces virtue and pretense is the greatest vice. 59

Pretenders are not only deflated in comedy but also displayed and celebrated. 62

Comedy deals not with representative types, but with extremes and caricatures. 69

III The Structure of Comedy 75

Comedies usually begin with a startling pronouncement or an outrageous situation. 76

The comic action is developed by repetition, accumulation, and snowballing. 82

Comedies are expected to end happily, with feasting, dancing, drinking, revelry, and the promise of offspring. 88

IV Forms of Comedy: Farce, Tragic Farce, Burlesque, Comedy of Manners, Satire, and Festive Comedy 95

A farce is a comedy with an extravagant plot in which anything can happen. The characters are developed by quirks and eccentricities rather than according to any believable, psychological truth. 97

In tragic farce, the themes and techniques of tragedy have been absorbed and comically transformed. 105

Burlesque comedy mocks the moral and stylistic pretensions of tragedy and romance. 115

In comedy of manners, the wits are arbiters of good taste, while the butts are awkward, stiff, pretentious, and social misfits. 121

Satiric comedy seeks to display and control its villain-heroes. 127

Festive comedy vanquishes all obstructions and asserts a hedonistic, holiday, carnival spirit. 135
