

Contents

Preface	v
Abbreviations	ix
Introduction	1
1. Preliminaries	5
1.1. The subject-matter of diachronic syntax	5
1.2. The logic of syntactic change	9
1.3. The North Germanic languages and dialects	10
1.4. Theoretical framework	13
1.5. The data	16
1.5.1. The lack of negative data	17
1.5.2. Literary sources and illiterate societies	18
1.5.3. The interpretation of data and syntactic theory	19
2. Explanation and syntactic change	31
2.1. The locus of linguistic change	31
2.2. The meaning of "explanation"	34
2.3. Explaining linguistic change	37
2.4. Motivation and predictability	41
2.5. Formal and functional explanations - a summary	44
3. Functional change	47
3.1. Synchronic variation and diachronic change	47
3.2. Word order typology	50
3.3. The verb-second constraint	59
3.4. The expletive topic	63
3.4.1. Describing the changes	66
3.4.2. Explaining the changes	68
3.4.3. Origin of expletive word	70

4. Formal change	75
4.1. Predicate and argument	75
4.2. Grammatical function and semantic role	78
4.3. Configurationality	82
4.3.1. Modern Norwegian as a configurational language	83
4.3.2. Characteristics of nonconfigurationality	85
4.3.3. Old Norse	86
4.3.3.1. VP-constituent?	86
4.3.3.2. Discontinuous phrases	94
4.3.3.3. Empty argument positions	102
4.3.3.4. Idioms	106
4.3.3.5. Conclusion	110
4.4. Prototypicality	110
4.4.1. Subject in Old Norse and Norwegian	112
4.4.1.1. Discourse functions	112
4.4.1.2. Syntactic properties	115
4.4.1.3. Semantic roles	127
4.4.2. Prototype and change	131
5. Some consequences	137
5.1. Case systems	137
5.1.1. Case system of Old Norse	140
5.1.2. Case system of modern Norwegian	150
5.1.3. Case system of modern Icelandic	159
5.1.4. Case system of modern Faroese	166
5.2. Passive	167
5.2.1. Passive and configurationality	168
5.2.2. Different passive constructions	173
5.3. "Impersonal" constructions	177
5.4. From preposition to verbal particle	185
5.5. The expletive subject	189
Notes	195
References	203
Index	215