

| | | |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------|-----|
| editor's notes | donald g. trites | vii |
| the college and youth | robert j. havighurst | 1 |
| Changes in the college-age population that will have major repercussions on institutions of postsecondary education. | | |
| the undergraduate college and the world of work | thomas f. green | 23 |
| The perennial topic of the relationship between liberal learning and career preparation deserves reexamination as interest in career education increases. | | |
| higher education and feminine socialization | elizabeth douvan | 37 |
| How colleges can better meet the educational needs of women—and, at the same time, of men. | | |
| the college as agent for social change | john u. monro | 51 |
| Among the responsibilities of the college is the improvement of the educational process itself. | | |
| the crisis of the scholarly enterprise | stephen p. dresch | 65 |
| The dimensions of the crisis have not yet been adequately explored, nor fully accounted for in policy development. | | |
| the college and its region | vivian w. henderson | 93 |
| How the transformation of an institution's environment, as illustrated by changes in the South, requires the reformation of its educational programs. | | |
| the college and the future: a policy perspective | donald g. trites | 99 |
| How institutions can invent the future by setting meaningful goals and involving many members in their implementation. | | |