

Preface and Acknowledgements vii

Notes to the Reader viii

1 INTRODUCTION I

2 BUILDING HIGH 5

Donjons and tower houses: the first phase • Later donjons and tower houses • Solar and residence towers • Tower houses in Scotland • Irish towers and Scottish flankers • Donjons go domestic: long and high tower houses • The last high houses • Lodges, gatehouses and lodging towers • Romantic castles

Intromission I: On Materials and Structures 73

3 EXPERIMENTATION AND PRAGMATIC DOUBLING 79

Living over the hall • Wings behind and before • Beginning to build in depth: doubling existing houses • A note on mezzanines • Fancies, conceits and icons

Intromission II: John Thorpe and Renaissance Ideas 125

4 THE INNER NEEDS: SOCIAL LIFE AND FAMILY LIFE 135

Owners and their needs • Patterns for living: dividing the house from side to side; dividing the house from front to back; dividing the house by floor level; dividing the house by the state centre • Houses with separate or semi-detached kitchen and services • The state great rooms: the hall; the great stair; great chamber, great dining room, great parlour; where to sleep: lodgings to apartments • Accommodating the household: little and common parlours, winter parlours, closets; long galleries, garrets and prospect rooms; chapels; lodging the family; the office • The services and the servants: kitchens and service rooms; placing the servants in the house; circulation through the house

Intromission III: Style and Symmetry 189

5 SQUARES AND 'ACCESS PLANS' 197

Preamble • The square idea • A mainly Welsh postscript

Intromission IV: A Formulation: Inigo Jones and Roger Pratt 221

6 FULLY DEVELOPED COMPACT PLANS 225

Simple spinal layouts • Complex spinal and triple-plan layouts • Axial halls • The state centre • The state centre takes wings

Intromission V: The View from the Seventeenth Century: Roger North's Idea 283

7 CONCLUSION: THE EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY STASIS 289

Notes 293

Bibliography 323

Index 329