

Contents to Volume 2

Acknowledgements	xii
Glossary	xiii
PART III: THE PHENOMENON OF WILLING
INTRODUCTION	xvii
8 Observation and the will	I
1 My actions are set in my world	I
2 The inter-dependence of physical action and perception	4
3 Agent and observer	15
4 Doing two things at once	21
5 Self-dispersal as the end of the impossible project of observing one's own acts	31
9 The speech- and truth-conditions of trying	39
1 Introduction	40
2 The speech-conditions governing the use of 'try'	41
3 The principles behind the speech-conditions	44
4 The general features of trying	46
5 Trying, instrumentality, and reasons	52
6 A limited provisional definition of instrumental trying	53
7 Second line of defence concepts	54
8 Summary	55
10 The sub-intentional act	58
1 A preliminary proof of the reality of the sub-intentional act	58
2 Reinforcing the argument for sub-intentionality	62
3 Comparing: sub-intentional act, mere perceptual sensation, mere material chunk	68
11 The striving nature of all action	75
1 The epistemological relation between a man and the contents of his own mind	75
2 Principle A: we relate epistemologically to bodily tryings as we do generally to sensations	81

3	The omnipresence of trying in physical action (α): the intentional instrumental physical action	88
4	The omnipresence of trying in physical action (β): intentional basic action	94
5	The omnipresence of trying in physical action (γ): sub-intentional action	95
6	Principle B: the attempt that succeeds is the act one succeeds in doing	100
7	The striving nature of all physical action	111
12	The definition of trying	113
1	Shortening the short-list of truth-conditions	113
2	Arriving at the definition of trying	115
3	The concept: the expression of an act-desire	117
4	The relation between instrumental desire and its handmaiden basic act-desire	120
5	On the mirror-image nature of the relation between desire and striving	126
13	The relation between the basic act and the willed event	127
1	Might Φ and ϕ be distinct?	127
2	The visibility of basic actions	130
14	The ontological status of physical action (1): defining the psychological and the mental	133
1	Uncertainty over the ontological status	133
2	Defining the psychological (α): delimiting the class	137
3	Defining the psychological (β): necessary and sufficient non-constitutive conditions	144
4	Ontological levels of being	146
5	Defining the mental (α): intentionality	148
6	Defining the mental (β): attention and consciousness	157
7	Defining the mental (γ): immanence-less-ness	168
8	Defining the mental (δ): the definition	180
9	Abbreviating the definition of the mental (Ψ)	181
10	Defining the psychological in terms of the mental	186
11	Ultimate definitions of mental (Ψ) and psychological (ψ)	191
12	Résumé: the nature of the dispute	191

15 The ontological status of physical action (2): the mind's body	193
1 Introduction	193
2 Precisely fixing the ontological status (α)	196
3 Precisely fixing the ontological status (β)	202
4 The unique structure of the bodily action	207
5 The mind's body and the body's mind	214
6 Animal and spiritual mind	224
16 Voluntariness and the volition	233
1 The theory of the volition	233
2 Voluntary actions	241
3 What makes voluntary actions voluntary?	250
4 Theories of the voluntary	261
5 The internal scene in voluntary physical action	270
6 Voluntariness	280
7 Summary	284
17 The antecedents of action	289
1 Mental causality	289
2 Desiring	295
3 Deciding	297
4 Choosing	302
5 Intending	303
6 The relation between intending and striving	330
7 The relation between striving and the willed event	346
8 Résumé: from inner to outer	354
Index	359