

Contents

Acknowledgements	ix
Introduction	1
Chapter 1 Critiquing journalism: a difficult exercise	12
1. The public: hostage to journalists	12
2. Journalists: hostages to the public	19
3. Two poles, two risks: what next?	32
Chapter 2 The notion of 'public', and what can be expected of it	43
1. The premises of the notion of 'public': liberal England in the seventeenth century	43
2. Kant and the principle of publicity (Offentlichkeit)	51
3. French Enlightenment and American Enlightenment	59
4. The denunciation of the naiveties of the notion of 'public': the problem of the domination of the 'homogenous' in democracy	67
Chapter 3 A first ideal-critique: the journalist-flâneur	84
1. Varying the gaze	84
2. An ambiguous and frustrating ideal	95
3. Fruitless exasperation: Karl Kraus as a modern Sisyphus	108

Chapter 4 A second ideal-critique: the conflictual journalist	118
1. The journalism of the young Karl Marx (1842–3)	122
2. The crisis of 1843: towards a radical critique of public space	133
3. Journalism, an ongoing problem: Marx as conflictual journalist	141
Chapter 5 A third ideal-critique: journalism as a 'conflictual unifying' of the democratic community	155
1. Gabriel Tarde and an answer to Gustave Le Bon	155
2. The sociologists of Chicago (R. E. Park, H. M. Hughes) faced with the reality of an 'integrating' journalist	162
3. The risk of myth	177
4. Towards a 'conflictual unifying': two journalistic acts	183
Chapter 6 The limitations of the figure of the 'spectator', and what they tell us about democracy	194
1. The journalism of decentring as the search for the limits of 'seeing'	194
2. The Sartrean critique of the position of the spectator	197
3. From the gaze to listening: Jean Hatzfeld on the Rwandan genocide	211
Epilogue	222
Notes	225
Bibliography	253
Index	264