

Contents

List of Illustrations	vii
Acknowledgments	ix
Series Editors' Introduction	xiii
Introduction: The Science of Imperial Modernity	1
PART 1. Paradoxes of Institutionalization
1. Academic Genealogy and Social Contexts of the "Atypical Science"	17
2. Anthropology as a "Regular Science": Kafedra	34
3. Anthropology as a Network Science: Society	54
PART 2. The Liberal Anthropology of Imperial Diversity: Apolitical Politics
4. Aleksei Ivanovskii's Anthropological Classification of the Family of "Racial Relatives"	101
5. "Russians" in the Language of Liberal Anthropology	121
6. Dmitrii Anuchin's Liberal Anthropology	133
PART 3. Anthropology of Russian Imperial Nationalism
7. Ivan Sikorsky and His "Imperial Situation"	167
8. Academic Racism and "Russian National Science"	185
PART 4. Anthropology of Russian Multinationalism
9. The Space between "Empire" and "Nation"	201
10. "Jewish Physiognomy," the "Jewish Question," and Russian Race Science between Inclusion and Exclusion	217

11. A “Dysfunctional” Colonial Anthropology
of Imperial Brains 251

PART 5. Russian Military Anthropology: From Army-as-Empire to Army-as-Nation

12. Military Mobilization of Diversity Studies 269

13. The Imperial Army through National Lenses 279

14. Nation Instead of Empire 286

PART 6. Race and Social Imagination

15. The Discovery of Population Politics and Sociobiological
Discourses in Russia 297

16. Meticization as Modernization, or the Sociobiological
Utopias of Ivan Ivanovich Pantiukhov 310

17. The Criminal Anthropology of Imperial Society 328

Conclusion: Did Russian Physical Anthropology
Become Soviet? 347

Notes 375

Index 473