

Introduction 1

Simplicity and the critic's vocabulary (1)—A cognitive approach (2)—The project of the present study (4)

I. The History of the Discussion 7

One such study of Hebrew metre (7)—Kraus' metrics (8)—Traversing the landscape (12)—No shared understanding of Hebrew poetry (13)—The history of the discussion (14)—Syntactic constrictions and Hebrew poetry (17)—Troping, constricting and their problems (20)—Obstacles to a theory of Hebrew poetry (21)—Towards a more comprehensive theory of Hebrew poetry (27)

II. Technicalities of Accentual Versification 31

Stress as rhythm (31)—Accentual versification (33)—Difficulties (36)—The shape of sounds (39)—In defence of the Masoretes (41)—Accentuating the Bible: a brief survey (43)

III. The Rhythm of Biblical Hebrew Verse: A Cognitive Approach 48

Biblical Hebrew poetry is rhythmic (48)—The accentual aspect of the three-part rhythm (50)—Tsur's argument (54)

IV. Applying Tsur to the Business of Biblical Verse 66

From an hypothesis to an empirical study (66)—Re-theorising Tsur (68)—Tsur re-theorised (69)

V. An Excursus on Parallelism 72

VI. Towards a Statement of Hebrew Verse: With a Case-Study in its Rhythm 78

An abridged musical analogy (78)—A case study in Qinah poetry (79)—Conclusion, being a statement of biblical Hebrew poetry (83)

Appendix to Chapter One: Recovering Paul Kraus 85

La belle époque (85)—Jābir ibn Ḥayyān (86)—Berlin to Paris (88)—And from Paris to Cairo (91)—Un passant (93)

Bibliography 94

Index 106