

CONTENTS

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

xi

INTRODUCTION

1

THE CHARACTERS

4

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

5

ONE

7

The subject is brought forward. Conversation on aesthetics; on impressionistic prose; lastly, on Swinburne's prose criticism in particular.

TWO

25

An apology for a lecture, which is then delivered. Quest themes in nineteenth-century English literature: Romantics and a few others; Tennyson, Browning, Arnold; Morris and Pre-Raphaelitism; Swinburne's place among them; an argument against his reputed perfectibilianism; objections to the argument; certain stylistic qualities of Swinburne's poetry epitomized in his taste for roundels. Conclusion.

THREE

50

Objections to the last lecture and some new proposals. Swinburne and Baudelaire; and Blake; and Mallarmé. A digression on certain characteristics of Romantic lyricism with particular reference to Blake, Shelley, and Browning. Swinburne and Yeats; and Shelley. General objection to the foregoing discussion. Swinburne as parodist, imitator, master of pastiche. Swinburne and the border ballad. Swinburne and Villon.

FOUR

93

Is Erechtheus Swinburne's greatest work? The relative merits of Atalanta in Calydon and Erechtheus. Discussions of Atalanta in Calydon; of "Itylus"; of "Sapphics"; of "Anactoria." The problem of Erechtheus. Discussion of the poem. Conclusion.

FIVE

132

Previous discussion of Swinburne's use of language is carried forward. Charges of vagueness and unintelligibility, especially in his later works. Refutation of the charges. Swinburne and the pun. Tristram of Lyonesse and its "Prelude"; "By the North Sea"; "To a Seamew." Some frequent devices in Swinburne's poetry. Punning again. Periodic and suspended structures: Tristram of Lyonesse and "Hermaphroditus." Objections. Swinburne's abstractness: Tristram of Lyonesse. Defense of Swinburne's "worked" language: "On the Cliffs" etc.

SIX

169

The argument on language continued. A summary and a new approach. Swinburne and boundaries. Some comparisons with Romantic poets, especially Wordsworth. Swinburne and the sleep-trance. Sleep-trance and boundaries in "The Lake of Gaube" and "A Nympholept." Poetic transformations. Swinburne's abstractness again. "Hymn of Man." Conclusion.

SEVEN

202

Swinburne's earlier work not vague and abstract. The social context of Poems and Ballads (1866). The biographical context. Poems and Ballads as an autobiographical fiction; as an autobiographical reality. Swinburne, Mary Gordon, and "The Triumph of Time." Swinburne in propria persona. The manuscript of "A Vision of Spring in Winter." Discussions.

Contents

EIGHT

237

Swinburne as moralist. Swinburne's political poetry compared with Hugo's. Songs before Sunrise: basic images, ideas, and attitudes. "Hertha" and Songs before Sunrise. The morality of "Laus Veneris"; of The Tale of Balen. Hugo, Malory, and the sense of history in Balen. Objections to Swinburne as moralist. The Flogging Block and other flagellant writings. Apology for their morality. Swinburne and Sade. The message of The Flogging Block. Its comic spirit. Abstraction and sexuality.

CONCLUSION

286

APPENDIX

"Ave atque Vale": An Introduction to Swinburne

292

GENERAL INDEX

313

INDEX OF SWINBURNE'S WORKS

318