

Contents

Acknowledgements	vii
Introduction: The Munby Archive	1
1 Academically Locating the Archive: History and Theory of Photography - The Nineteenth Century	7
Photography's pre-industrial age: 1850–60	11
Back to the archive	14
The urban collection	17
2 What is a Photograph?	19
3 The City, Photography and Relations of Looking	27
Munby, photography and the flâneur	31
Mid-Victorian painting and the imagining of class	34
Photography and class in the mid-Victorian period	39
4 Who was Munby? Useful Readings of the Munby Archive	45
Munby: the flâneur and man about town	51
5 Munby and the Turn to Photography: Hannah, the Private Urban Collection and the Search for Photographic Truth	67
Taking 'attitudes': the photographing of Hannah Cullwick	76
6 Starting to Collect: Munby and his Turn to Commercially Produced Photographs of Working-Class Women	123
Ensuring urban authenticity and controlling photographic indexicality	136
'Photographic hunting and people studying': photography and the new urban working class	139
Photographic acceptance: replacing the text with the image	164

Contents

7 Dressing Above Your Station and Making it Work for Him: Domestic Photographs of the Urban Working-Class Woman	175
Maidservants in working dress	190
The inherent problem of indexicality, gazing and power	196
Three photographs: three problems	200
Accepting photographic veracity and the formation of photographic genres in the 1860s and the 1870s	206
Photography and the formation and control of class difference	213
8 Under the Skin: Munby's Photographs of Facially Disfigured Women – The Real and the Symbolic	219
Photography and the abject body	230
Photography, the real and the inhumanity of power	240
Appendix: The Photographic Archive	245
Album one	245
Album two	246
Album three	246
Album four	248
Album five	252
Album six	255
Album seven	257
Miscellaneous	257
The shelves	258
Notes	261
Bibliography	277
Index	290