Chapter I. Introduction . . . . .	Page 13
Marot, the author of the first Élégies in French in the sixteenth century: Theories concerning the elegy in early sixteenth century Arts Poétiques : The influence of Ovid's Heroides on the creation of the elegy: Popularity of Ovid throughout the Middle Ages, more particularly his Metamorphoses &amp; Heroides : Octovien de Saint-Gelais' translation of the Heroides as Les XXI Epistres d'Ovide : Subsequent spread of the Épître Amoureuse : Some translations of Ovid's Amores : The Heroides and the Épître Amoureuse the forerunners of Marot's Élégies .
Chapter II. The Elegies of Clément Marot . . . . .	Page 39
Marot's hesitations in classifying his Élégies —their dual nature: Borrowings from Tibullus and Propertius in the love elegies: The Élégies as personal lyricism: The influence of Ovid, and more particularly the Heroides on the Élégies : The nature of Marot's debt to the poets of Antiquity in his love elegies: The predominance of mediaeval influence: The élégies déploratives , problems of definition and classification: The Élégie du riche infortuné Jacques de Beaune, Seigneur de Semblançay —imitation of Villon: Marot inventor of two "pseudo-myths": The nature of Marot's elegies—scope of his imitation of the Latin elegiac poets, predominance of Ovid, mediaeval influence.
Chapter III. Interpretations of the Elegy by Bouchet and Sagon . . . . .	Page 57
Curious interpretations of the elegy by two "conservative" poets: Bouchet's " Élégie " on the death of Renée de Bourbon: similarity to the Complaintes &amp; Déplorations of the other Rhétoriciens despite its title: Bouchet's love elegies—principally influenced by the Roman de la Rose , and Alain Chartier—some borrowings from Ovid: Sagon—reasons for entitling his verses directed against Marot Élégie : the nature and quality of Sagon's Élégie : Both Bouchet and Sagon influenced by Marot's choice of the title—not themselves innovators.
Chapter IV. Charles de Sainte-Marthe's Elegies . . . . .	Page 77
Distinctions between the Épître and the Élégie —"gravité" and "diversité" of Sainte-Marthe's Élégies : Influences on Sainte-Marthe, la Réforme , Marot, Marguerite de Navarre: L'Élégie du Tempé de France —possible sources: Sainte-Marthe's religious and philosophical preoccupations in the remaining elegies: The Élégie en forme d'Épître à Monsieur le Chevalier de Monthozier , imitation of the Chansons Spirituelles of Marguerite de Navarre: The Élégie à Monsieur de Verjust Doyen de Macon, De la vraye Noblesse —imitation of Juvenal: another elegy with a similar theme, A P. de Marillac Que le Cœur fort et magnanime est le seul riche du monde par son contentement : Two elegies with specifically religious themes—the Élégie Du vray bien et nourriture de l'Âme , and the Élégie de l'Âme parlante au Corps et monstrante le profit de la Mort : Sainte-Marthe's interest in the mediaeval Débat du corps et de l'âme : Sainte-Marthe's Platonism: Sainte-Marthe, generally a close imitator of Marot shows a certain amount of independence in his Élégies .

Chapter V. The Elegies of Charles Fontaine . . . . .	Page 97
Distinctions between Fontaine's Epîtres and Elégies : Fontaine's stay in Italy: Imitation of Ovid and Catullus: Petrarchism: The influence of Marot: Mediaeval elements in Fontaine's elegies. Fontaine's élégies déploratives —imitation of Jean de Boyssonné and Ovid: Fontaine as a follower of Marot: growing influence of Petrarchism and Ovid's Amores .
Chapter VI. The Elegy in France from 1545 to 1548 . . . . .	Page 123
Gradual establishment of a pattern for the Elégie : Pernette Du Guillet's Elégies —their classification by Antoine Du Moulin and by a modern critic: Pernette's degree of originality: Imitation of the literature of Antiquity, of Maurice Scève, of Marot: Pernette's imitation of the Paragon traduit d'italien en françoys : Victor Brodeau's Elégie du Semi Dieu Faunus : Gilles d'Aurigny, his Elégie du Cheval de Monsieur de la Clayette , his two love elegies: Etienne Forcadet, his two elegies which appeared in 1548 in the Chant des Seraines : love as the principal theme; influence of Petrarchism: emergence of a certain unity of form and content of the elegies written around this date.
Chapter VII. Conclusion . . . . .	Page 147
Evolution of the elegy from the Heroides and the Epître Amoureuse : Marot's Elégies and their influence—"il a lancé une mode": Diversity of the earlier examples of the elegy, Bouchet, Sagon, Sainte-Marthe: A more definite pattern emerging by 1548: Further examples of elegies of the "marotique" type: The elegies of the Pléiade poets: confusion of Ronsard's definition of the elegy: Durability of the love epistle type of elegy—Marot's example not eclipsed until the end of the century.
