
Contents

Issue Editor's Notes 1

Marina Umaschi Bers

Executive Summary 5

1. Beyond computer literacy: Supporting youth's positive development through technology 13

Marina Umaschi Bers

New technologies in educational programs can support youth development and learning.

2. Educational technology, reimagined 25

Michael Eisenberg

Innovative systems support creative learning in children's lives.

3. Children as codesigners of new technologies: Valuing the imagination to transform what is possible 35

Allison Druin

The chapter explores a method for designing innovative technologies by children for children.

4. Content creation in virtual worlds to support adolescent identity development 45

Laura M. Beals

Adolescents explore issues of identity by learning, playing, and growing in a virtual world.

5. Youth as content producers in a niche social network site 55

Christine Greenbow

Hot Dish, an application within Facebook, promotes self-expression, social connections, and civic involvement.

6. YouTube as a participatory culture 65

Clement Chau

Youth create content and social networks by sharing videos in a participatory media culture.

7. Making projects, making friends: Online community as catalyst for interactive media creation 75
Karen Brennan, Andrés Monroy-Hernández, Mitchel Resnick
Scratch is an online community for young people to create interactive media.
 8. Augmenting your own reality: Student authoring of science-based augmented reality games 85
Eric Klopfer, Josh Sheldon
Students make their own games to understand science issues in their communities.
 9. Developing technological initiatives for youth participation and local community engagement 95
Leo Burd
New technologies to foster youth participation and civic engagement.
 10. “MXing it up”: How African adolescents may affect social change through mobile phone use 105
Christopher M. Napolitano
Mobile phones are changing the forms of social communication for Africa’s adolescents.
 11. El Silencio: A rural community of learners and media creators 115
Claudia Urrea
The author examines a one student–one laptop international project as a way to rethink learning in rural settings.
- Index 125