Preface	vii
About the Editor	ix
About the Contributors	x
1. The Setting: Broadening the Presidential Talent Pool—for Better and Worse Michael Nelson Reaching beyond the traditional ranks of male office holders, in 2016 the nation considered the first woman ever nominated by a major political party for president and elected the first chief executive whose career included no experience in government.	1
2. The Nominations: The Road to a Much-Disliked General Election William G. Mayer Strategic miscalculations, plus a good deal of luck, led to the nomination of two of the most widely unpopular political figures in American politics.	29
3. The Election: The Allure of the Outsider Marc J. Hetherington The election of 2016 will rank among the most unusual for decades to come, with partisanship and public dissatisfaction with the political class the key to understanding the outcome.	63
4. Voting Behavior: Continuity and Confusion in the Electorate Nicole E. Mellow In very different ways, Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton upended historical norms and were broadly unpopular, yet voters were loyal in their party support, dividing sharply over the merits of globalization, neoliberalism, and related questions of what it means to be American.	87

5. The Media: Covering Donald Trump 113
Marjorie Randon Hershey
How did journalists deal with the challenge of covering Donald Trump, who ran the least conventional presidential campaign in recent memory—and how did their coverage decisions affect Americans' ability to cast an informed vote?
6. Campaign Finance: Where Big Money Mattered and Where It Didn't 137
Marian Currinder
Although big spending didn't pay off in the presidential contest, it did in congressional races, where 96 percent of Senate races and 94 percent of House races were won by the biggest spender.
7. Congress: Nationalized, Polarized, and Partisan 165
Gary C. Jacobson
Despite the deep intraparty divisions exposed by the presidential election in 2016, the congressional elections were thoroughly nationalized, party- and president-centered events, indistinguishable from what would be expected in a typical contest between typical Republican and Democratic presidential candidates.
8. The Presidency: Donald Trump and the Question of Fitness 189
Paul J. Quirk
The voters chose as president a man who most of the political elite, including many Republicans, believed was not fit for the office.
9. The Meaning of the 2016 Election: The President as Minority Leader 217
Andrew Rudalevige
Political scientists' models rightly predicted a close race, and a toss-up election brought change to the White House while reelecting incumbents everywhere else. The divisive national campaign, centered on personality and partisanship, presaged the difficulty the new president will have in forging a mandate.
