

---

Contents

---

List of Illustrations and Maps

List of Tables

List of Abbreviations

Acknowledgements

Foreword

1. After Sarajevo — Will There be War?	1
The first week	1
Meetings and markets — the second week	5
‘There is no going back’ — the third week	9
The ultimatum is delivered — markets respond	15
The fifth week starts — diplomatic action and inaction	18
Dollars, roubles and crowns are dumped	22
Austria declares war — the flight into gold	23
Tsar and Kaiser exchange telegrams — markets lose hope	26
The last escape, 30 July–1 August	28
Did investors miscalculate?	33
2. War, Peace Rumours and Currency Speculation	36
Autumn 1914 — markets re-open	37
New strength for the neutral currencies — 1915	39
Amsterdam — the new financial centre of Europe	40
French francs, roubles and the Russian retreat, autumn 1915	43
Peace rumours fail to impress, end-1915	49
First restrictions on exchange markets in Central Powers, early 1916	51
Silver, silver currencies, and silver smuggling boom	52
Capital flight from Russia, 1916 — will there be a separate peace?	53
Economists debate war and currencies	55
After the battle of Verdun — will there be peace?	57
Instability of the neutral currencies, 1916	60
Peace notes, December 1916	61

Central Powers attack capital flight, early 1917	65
The U-boat war — fears in the neutral countries	66
The Tsar abdicates — false expectations	67
Will the US enter the war? What then for the dollar?	69
A new problem for Japan — how to keep down the yen	71
Neutral currencies soar, autumn 1917	72
The rouble and the provisional government crumble	73
Russia's defeat provides brief opportunity to sell marks and crowns	76
Germany's offensive, spring 1918 — a new high for the neutrals	78
The tide turns, July 1918 — but the mark recovers too	80
Markets and governments mistake the nature of peace, October 1918	83
3. Life After Death for the Austro-Hungarian Crown	93
Chances of survival for the Empire dwindle — January 1917 to October 1918	93
How long can the crown outlive Austria-Hungary?	100
Looming monetary nationalism in Central Europe	104
Czechoslovakia breaks with the crown: Austria retaliates	107
The outlook for the new Czech and Austrian crowns, March 1919	110
Lingering optimism on the Austrian crown, April–June 1919	113
Czech crown disappoints expectations, 1919–20	115
Capital flight from Vienna and the St Germain Peace	118
Czech crown's brief independence of the mark, 1922–23	123
4. Weimar, Poincaré and the Mark's Destruction	129
The outlook for the mark at end-1918	129
Six months disillusionment, January to June 1919	133
Capital flight and Erzberger's tax plans, July 1919 to February 1920	139

The big recovery of the mark, spring 1920	147
Speculating on the size of the reparations bill, July 1920 to March 1921	154
Prospects for the mark under the Erfüllungspolitik	158
New lapse of the mark and fears of fraudulent bankruptcy — autumn 1921	161
The threat of Ruhr occupation and Germany's descent into hyper-inflation, autumn 1922	170
Lingering hopes fade, November to 4 January, 1923	178
The Ruhr invaded: what next for the mark?	185
Three months of Grosse Koalition , August to mid-November 1923	188
Scepticism about the Rentenbank Law, November 1923	195
The tide turns, December 1923	198
5. The Wall Street–Berlin Axis	211
How long can the miracle last?	212
The disquieting signals, 1924–28	216
The flow of capital changes direction, autumn 1928 to end-1929	223
After the Wall Street crash: will foreign capital return?	227
New German political risks — spring and summer 1930	235
Hedge-investment ahead of the September 1930 election	238
After the election, what next?	241
The post-election wave of capital flight	244
Interlude — until April 1931	246
The great wave of capital flight; its beginnings	248
How much did Germany's creditors salvage?	262
Capital flight from Central Europe and Britain, July to October 1931	265
Chronology	278
Bibliography	284
Index	291