

Table of Contents

Introduction	xi
Editions of Des vrayes et des fausses idées	xxxiii
The Text of Novae Objectiones
Translator's Note

ON TRUE AND FALSE IDEAS

PREAMBLE. That we believe we have demonstrated that what the author of the book THE SEARCH FOR TRUTH says about the subject is based on nothing more than false prejudices, and that nothing is more groundless than his claim THAT WE SEE ALL THINGS IN GOD .	1
Chapter I. Rules which we ought to keep in mind in order to seek the truth in this matter of ideas, and in many other similar matters.	3
Chapter II. The principal things each person can know about his soul, by consulting it himself with a little attention.	5
Chapter III. That the author of The Search for Truth has spoken about ideas differently in the first two books of his work, than he has in Book III, where he treats of them explicitly.	8
Chapter IV. That what the author of The Search for Truth says about the nature of ideas in his Book III, is based only on fantasies which we retain from the prejudices of childhood.	12
Chapter V. That we can prove geometrically the falsity of ideas , taken in the sense of representative beings. Definitions, Axioms and Postulates to serve as principles for the demonstrations.	19
Chapter VI. Explication of these expressions: We do not see things immediately; their ideas are the immediate object of our thought; and it is in the idea of each thing that we see its properties.	25
Chapter VII. Demonstrations against ideas taken as representative entities , distinct from perceptions. DEMONSTRATION I.	32

Chapter VIII. DEMONSTRATION II.	35
Chapter IX. DEMONSTRATION III.	42
Chapter X. DEMONSTRATION IV.	44
Chapter XI. DEMONSTRATION V.	49
Chapter XII. Of the way in which the author of The Search for Truth claims that we see things in God. That he has spoken with little exactness but great variety about the things he claims we see in God.	58
Chapter XIII. That he has also given various explanations of the ways in which we see things in God. That the first was by means of ideas. That he departed from it when he denied that there are ideas in the intelligible world which represent each thing in particular, something which cannot be denied without error.	63
Chapter XIV. A second way of seeing things in God, which is to see them in an infinite intelligible extension , which God includes. What is said about that is either completely unworthy of God or manifestly self-contradictory.	69
Chapter XV. That the infinite intelligible extension could not be a way for us to see things that we did not know and would like to know.	81
Chapter XVI. That what the author has our mind do in order to find its ideas in his infinite intelligible extension , is contrary to experience and to the general laws which God has prescribed for himself in order to give us knowledge of his works.	87
Chapter XVII. Another variation in the author, who sometimes says that we see God when we see creatures in God, and sometimes that we do not see him, but only see the creatures.	94
Chapter XVIII. Concerning three prejudices which could make it difficult for people to accept what has been said against the new philosophy of ideas, of which the first is the esteem in which the author is held.	99
Chapter XIX. Concerning the second prejudice, which is that the new philosophy of ideas shows better than any other how minds are dependant on God and how they ought to be united to him.	103
Chapter XX. Concerning the third prejudice: that when the philosophy of ideas is not accepted, we are reduced to saying that our soul thinks because that is its nature and because God gave it the faculty of thinking when he created it.	112

Chapter XXI. That when the author says there are things we see without an idea, what he means is not sufficiently disentangled, and causes so much confusion that one can have no clear notion of it.	116
Chapter XXII. That if it were true that we see material things through representative beings (which is the same thing for the author as seeing them in God), he would have had no reason to claim that we do not see our soul in that way.	121
Chapter XXIII. Response to the arguments which the author brings forward to show that we do not have a clear idea of our soul, and that we do have one of extension.	126
Chapter XXIV. Conclusions from the author's arguments against the clarity of the idea of the soul. Why he was not able to find it in himself.	144
Chapter XXV. Whether we know the souls of other men without an idea.	153
Chapter XXVI. Whether we see God in himself and without an idea.	155
Chapter XXVII. Concerning the origin of ideas. That there is no reason to think our soul is purely passive with regard to all of its perceptions, and that it is much more probable that it has received from God the faculty of forming some of them.	162
Chapter XXVIII. Various reflections on the statement of the author of The Search for Truth , that we can be entirely sure of the existence of bodies only by faith.	172
CONCLUSION.	183

NEW OBJECTIONS
to Descartes' Meditations, with Descartes' Replies

First Letter	185
Descartes' Reply	189
Second Letter	190
Descartes' Reply	193
INDEX	197