Contents

| List of maps  | vii  |
|---|------|
| Preface and acknowledgements  | viii |
| Abbreviations   | х    |
| Introduction  | 1    |
| Chapter 1: The textual history of the Canso d'Antioca                       | 5    |
| Gregory Bechada's verse chronicle   | 5    |
| The development of a Canso d'Antioca tradition after Bechada                | 9    |
| The Madrid fragment   | 17   |
| Fragments of the Madrid text in the Gran Conquista de Ultramar              | 28   |
| The Canso de San Gili: a lost section of the Madrid fragment?               | 45   |
| General conclusion  | 48   |
| Chapter 2: The Canso d'Antioca and the vernacular epic tradition of         |      |
| the First Crusade   | 51   |
| The Old French Crusade Cycle  | 51   |
| The place of the Chanson d'Antioche in the Old French                       |      |
| Crusade Cycle: a later edition of an eyewitness text?                       | 55   |
| The relationship of the Antioche to the Occitan tradition                   | 63   |
| An alternative Old French verse description of the First Crusade: Hatton 77 |      |
| and the Spalding manuscript   | 71   |
| Conclusion  | 77   |
| Chapter 3: The Madrid fragment as history                                   | 79   |
| The historical background   | 79   |
| The sources for the crusade   | 85   |
| The battle of Antioch and its significance                                  | 92   |
| The relationship between the Canso tradition and other sources              | 100  |
| The reliability of the Canso tradition                                      | 113  |
| Conclusions   | 116  |
|   |      |

| Chapter 4: Where history and literature meet: the place of the               |            |  |
|--|------------|--|
| Canso tradition in vernacular literature                                     | 119        |  |
| How history was written in the twelfth century                               | 119        |  |
| Form and intention in twelfth-century vernacular historiography              |            |  |
| The stated intentions of twelfth-century vernacular historiographers and the |            |  |
| relationship with the chanson de geste                                       | 126        |  |
| Bechada as historiographer   | 132        |  |
| Gregory Bechada: a twelfth-century Occitan trailblazer?                      | 139        |  |
| The epic style of the Madrid fragment  | 140159 |  |
| The place of the Madrid fragment in epic tradition                           |            |  |
| Conclusion   | 162        |  |
| Appendix to chapter 4: the allusions to the Roland tradition in the          |            |  |
| Madrid fragment  | 165        |  |
| The Roland tradition in Occitania  | 165        |  |
| The two allusions in the Madrid fragment                                     | 170        |  |
| Chapter 5: Editorial principles and practices                                | 175        |  |
| Features of the manuscript   |            |  |
| Summary of editing principles and practices                                  | 189        |  |
| Text and translation   | 191        |  |
| Explanatory notes  | 239        |  |
| Glossary   | 303        |  |
| Bibliography   | 307        |  |
| Index of proper names in the Madrid fragment                                 | 327        |  |
|  |            |  |

List of maps

| Map 1 | 8  |
|-------|----|
| Map 2 | 8: |
| Man 3 | 84 |